Summary

1. This interpretation guideline will help taxpayers to determine their employment status for tax purposes.
2. The guideline updates the 1999 interpretation guideline “Employee or independent contractor?”, Tax Information Bulletin Vol 11, No 2 (February 1999). The 1999 interpretation guideline outlined the tests for determining whether a person is an employee or independent contractor. This interpretation guideline does not signal a change of approach.
3. The tax obligations of a taxpayer with respect to amounts earned from work done by the taxpayer depend on his or her employment status (ie, whether the taxpayer is an employee or an independent contractor).
4. The Income Tax Act 2007 defines the term “employee”. Parts of this definition require it to be determined that the taxpayer is employed under a contract of service. Under the Goods and Services Tax Act 1985, supplies of goods and services under a “contract of service” are not taxable. These provisions do not specify how it is to be determined whether there is a contract of service in any particular case. Therefore, it is necessary to rely on the common law to determine whether there is a contract of service.
5. The common law distinguishes between contracts of service and contracts for services. A contract of service means there is an employer–employee relationship; a contract for services means there is a principal–independent contractor relationship. At common law, the courts have developed various tests to determine whether there is a contract of service or a contract for services. The case law shows that the main tests are the intention, control, independence, fundamental and integration tests. These tests can be summarised as follows:
 - Intention test – looks at the intentions of each party to the agreement as to the nature of the relationship.
 - Control test – examines the degree of control the person engaged to perform the services exerts over the manner in which the work is done. A high level of control supports the conclusion that the person engaged to perform the services is an employee.

- Independence test – examines the level of independence the person engaged to perform the services exerts over their work. A high level of independence supports the conclusion that the person engaged to perform the services is an independent contractor.
 - Fundamental test – considers whether the person engaged to perform the services is doing so as a person in business on his or her own account. If the answer is “yes”, then this supports the conclusion that the person is an independent contractor; if the answer is “no” this supports the conclusion that the person is an employee.
 - Integration test – looks at whether the person engaged to perform the services is integrated into the business that hired him or her. If the person is integrated into the business, this supports the conclusion that he or she is an employee. By contrast, if the person is not integrated into the business, but rather an accessory to it, this supports the conclusion that he or she is an independent contractor.
6. This interpretation guideline considers decisions on employment status that were delivered after the 1999 guideline was published, most notably the Supreme Court decision in Bryson v Three Foot Six Ltd. In Bryson the Supreme Court considered whether a person was an “employee” under the Employment Relations Act 2000. The decision is still relevant because the Supreme Court considered the common law tests. Bryson is consistent with the Court of Appeal’s decision in TNT Worldwide Express Ltd v Cunningham. The 1999 guideline identified TNT as the leading New Zealand authority on determining employment status. However, in Bryson the Supreme Court held that industry practice is a factor that may be considered in the context of the intention test, because it may assist in determining the parties’ intention as to the nature of their relationship. The relevance of industry practice was not considered in TNT.

Analysis

7. This interpretation guideline is divided into the following parts:
- Types of employment relationship: discusses the difference between “contracts of service” (which employees have) and “contracts for services” (which independent contractors have).
 - Employment status and tax law: outlines the significance to taxpayers of their employment status. It also explains how the common law on determining employment status can be relevant when determining taxpayers’ employment status under the Goods and Services Tax Act 1985 and the Income Tax Act 2007.
 - Relevance of Employment Relations Act 2000 case law: considers s 6 of the Employment Relations Act 2000. Section 6 defines the term “employee” for the purposes of that Act. This part concludes that s 6 decisions are relevant when determining employment status for tax purposes to the extent that those decisions concern the common law on the employee/independent contractor distinction.
 - Common law on determining employment status – leading New Zealand authorities: discusses the leading New Zealand authorities on determining employment status – Bryson v Three Foot Six Ltd [2005] NZSC 34, [2005] 3 NZLR 721 (SCNZ) and TNT Worldwide Express Ltd v Cunningham [1993] 3 NZLR 681 (CA).
 - Common law tests: summarises the main tests for deciding employment status – the intention of the parties, control, independence, fundamental and integration tests.
 - Recent decisions: summarises three recent cases so as to illustrate how the courts have applied the common law tests; and lists other decisions on employment status from the Employment Court, Employment Relations Authority and Taxation Review Authority since Bryson.

Types of employment relationship

8. Legal rights and obligations can depend on the employment relationship between two persons. The law distinguishes between two types of employment relationship: employer – employee and principal – independent contractor. Which type of employment relationship exists in any particular case depends on whether there is a “contract of service” or a “contract for services” between the persons concerned. In New Zealand Educational Institute v Director-General of Education [1981] 1 NZLR 538, the Court of Appeal stated (at 539):

On many occasions over the years the Courts have had to decide whether the relationship between two persons was that of employer and employee or, as it used to be called, master and servant. The inquiry normally involved the distinction between a contract of service in which the relation was that of employer and employee and a contract for services in which the relation was that between employer and independent contractor. A decision in any particular case required an examination of the contract between the two - it might be expressed in words or it might be implicit from the circumstances.

9. Employees have a “contract of service” with their employer. Contracts of service evolved from the earlier concept of a master–servant relationship. Such a relationship required an employee to be continuously available for service and to accept a high degree of control by the employer. A “contract for services” applies to the relationship between an independent contractor and a principal. It emphasises the nature of the services to be provided by a person rather than his or her availability to work as directed.
10. At common law, the courts have developed several tests to determine whether there is a contract of service or a contract for services. The case law shows that the main tests are the intention, control, independence, fundamental and integration tests. These tests are discussed in paragraphs 46 – 73 below.

Employment status and tax law

Consequences of employment status for tax purposes

11. The tax obligations of a taxpayer with respect to payments received for work done by the taxpayer depend on his or her employment status (ie, whether the taxpayer is an employee or an independent contractor). Employment status has the following consequences for tax purposes:
- Payments to employees from their employer must have PAYE deducted at source.
 - Employees cannot register for GST or charge GST for services they supply as employees.
 - Independent contractors may deduct certain expenses incurred in deriving assessable income.
 - Independent contractors must account to Inland Revenue for tax and accident compensation earner and employee premiums for themselves and any employees.
 - Independent contractors must meet all the requirements of the Goods and Services Tax Act 1985 if the services they supply are in the course of a taxable activity and they are registered (or liable to register) for GST.
12. Taxpayers cannot change their employment status (or the resulting tax implications of that status) merely by calling themselves independent contractors when they are essentially still employees.

Relevance of common law tests under tax law

13. Both the Income Tax Act 2007 and the Goods and Services Tax Act 1985 distinguish between payments made under contracts of service and payments made under contracts for services. They do not however specify how it is to be determined whether there is a contract of service or a contract for services in any particular case. It is therefore necessary to rely on the common law tests for determining employment status.

Income Tax Act 2007

14. The Income Tax Act 2007 (ITA) defines the term “employee” in s YA 1 as follows:

employee—

- (a) means a person who receives or is entitled to receive a PAYE income payment:
- (b) in sections CW 17, CW 17B, CW 17C, and CW 18 (which relate to expenditure, reimbursement, and allowances of employees) includes a person to whom section RD 3(2) to (4) (PAYE income payments) applies:
- (c) in the FBT rules, and in the definition of shareholder-employee (paragraph (b)), does not include a person if the only PAYE income payment received or receivable is—
 - (i) a payment referred to in section RD 5(1)(b)(iii), (3), (6)(b) and (c) and (7) (Salary or wages):
 - (ii) a schedular payment referred to in schedule 4, parts A and I (Rates of tax for schedular payments) for which the person is liable for income tax under section BB 1 (Imposition of income tax):
- (d) is defined in section DC 15 (Some definitions) for the purposes of sections DC 12 to DC 14 (which relate to share purchase schemes):
- (db) does not include an owner of a look-through company or a person who has a look-through interest for a look-through company, unless the owner or person is a working owner:
- (e) for an employer, means an employee of the employer

Paragraph (a) defines “employee” for the purposes of the PAYE rules. It uses the term “PAYE income payment”, which is defined in s RD 3(1) as follows:

- (1) The PAYE rules apply to a PAYE income payment which—

(a) means—

- (i) a payment of salary or wages, see section RD 5; or
- (ii) extra pay, see section RD 7; or
- (iii) a schedular payment, see section RD 8:

15. Parts of the s YA 1 definition of “employee” require it to be determined that the taxpayer to whom the payment was made was employed under a contract of service. These parts are:

- “salary or wages” (s RD 5(1)(a)):
 - (1) Salary or wages—
 - (a) means a payment of salary, wages, or allowances made to a person in connection with their employment
- “an extra pay” (s RD 7(1)(a)(i)):
 - (1) An extra pay—
 - (a) means a payment that—
 - (i) is made to a person in connection with their employment
- “employee” (s DC 15):
 - employee—
 - (a) means a person employed by a company

(This definition of “employee” is for the purposes of ss DC 12 to DC 14, which concern share purchase schemes between employers and employees.)

16. That the above provisions apply where there is a contract of service is shown by the use of the words “employment” and “employed”. This interpretation is supported by Challenge Realty Ltd v CIR (1990) 12 NZTC 7,212. In this decision, the Court of Appeal considered the definition of “salary or wages” in s 2 of the Income Tax Act 1976. This definition provided:

“Salary or wages”, in relation to any person, means salary, wages, or allowances (whether in cash or otherwise), including all sums received or receivable by way of overtime pay, bonus, gratuity, extra salary, commission, or remuneration of any kind, in respect of or in relation to the employment of that person

Delivering the judgment of the Court, Bisson J stated (at 7,224):

In the context of sec 2, the word “employment”, in our view, relates to a contract of service It is that word which governs the definition: the definition being intended to include all forms of remuneration received under a contract of employment

Consequently, the definition of “salary or wages” did not include amounts received as remuneration under a contract for services.

17. The ITA does not specify how it is to be determined whether the taxpayer concerned is employed under a contract of service. It is therefore necessary to rely on the common law on determining employment status. As a general principle of statutory interpretation, where legislation makes use of terms with established meanings at common law, it is presumed that Parliament intended those terms to be given their common law meanings (subject to any contrary legislative intention): Bank of England v Vagliano Bros [1891] AC 107; R v Kerr [1988] 1 NZLR 270 (CA). As mentioned earlier, the common law distinguishes between contracts of service and contracts for services, and the courts have developed tests to establish whether there is a contract of service or a contract for services.
18. However, it is important to highlight that other parts of the definition of “employee” in the ITA do not rely on the common law. The ITA identifies particular classes of persons and payments that are included or excluded from the term “employee”. For example:

- Section RD 3(1)(b) provides that the term “PAYE income payment” does not include:
 - (i) an amount attributed under section GB 29 (Attribution rule: calculation):
 - (ii) an amount paid to a shareholder-employee in the circumstances set out in subsection (2):
 - (iii) an amount paid or benefit provided, by a person (the claimant) who receives a personal service rehabilitation payment from which an amount of tax has been withheld at the rate specified in schedule 4, part I (Rates of tax for schedular payments) or under section RD 18 (Schedular payments without notification), to another person for providing a key aspect of social rehabilitation referred to in paragraph (c) of the definition of personal service rehabilitation payment in section YA 1 (Definitions).
- Section YA 1 defines the term “employment” (for the purposes of the definition “salary or wages” (s RD 5) and “an extra pay” (s RD 7)) to include:

the activities performed by a member of Parliament or a judicial officer that gives rise to an entitlement to receive a PAYE income payment for the activities.

Similarly, s RD 5(5) provides that the term “salary or wages” includes salary and allowances made to the Governor-General, members of Parliament and judicial officers.

- Section DC 15 excludes from the definition of “employee” for the purposes of ss DC 12 to DC 14:
 - (i) a director of the company; or

- (ii) a person who, with any associated person, holds 10% or more of the issued capital of the company; or
- (iii) a company, a local authority, a public authority, or an unincorporated body of persons

19. It is noted that the term "PAYE income payment" includes "a schedular payment" as defined in s RD 8 and schedule 4 of the ITA. Schedule 4 sets out payments to a wide variety of workers including, for example, insurance agents and shearers. A worker who receives "a schedular payment" will typically be an independent contractor at common law. If an independent contractor receives "a schedular payment", then tax must be deducted at source. However, the other consequences of being an independent contractor set out in paragraph 11 remain.

Goods and Services Tax Act 1985

20. Under the Goods and Services Tax Act 1985 (GSTA), employees are not liable for GST on supplies of goods and services they make to their employers. This is the result of s 6(3)(b) excluding from the definition of "taxable activity" supplies made by a person pursuant to "any engagement, occupation, or employment under any contract of service or as a director of a company" [emphasis added]. The GSTA does not specify how it is to be determined whether there is a "contract of service". For the reason explained in paragraph 17 above, it is therefore necessary to rely on the common law tests for determining whether there is a contract of service or contract for services.

Relevance of Employment Relations Act 2000 case law

21. The common law tests for determining whether there is a contract of service or a contract for services have been developed by the courts over numerous decisions. In a few of these decisions the courts were determining employment status for tax purposes. However, in most decisions the courts were determining employment status under the employment legislation. The employment legislation currently in force is the Employment Relations Act 2000 (ERA). Section 6(1), (2) and (3) of the ERA defines the term "employee" as follows:

- (1) In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, employee—
 - (a) means any person of any age employed by an employer to do any work for hire or reward under a contract of service; and
 - (b) includes—
 - (i) a homemaker; or
 - (ii) a person intending to work; but
 - (c) excludes a volunteer who—
 - (i) does not expect to be rewarded for work to be performed as a volunteer; and
 - (ii) receives no reward for work performed as a volunteer; and
 - (d) excludes, in relation to a film production, any of the following persons:
 - (i) a person engaged in film production work as an actor, voice-over actor, stand-in, body double, stunt performer, extra, singer, musician, dancer, or entertainer;
 - (ii) a person engaged in film production work in any other capacity.
- (1A) However, subsection (1)(d) does not apply if the person is a party to, or covered by, a written employment agreement that provides that the person is an employee.
- (2) In deciding for the purposes of subsection (1)(a) whether a person is employed by another person under a contract of service, the court or the Authority (as the case may be) must determine the real nature of the relationship between them.
- (3) For the purposes of subsection (2), the court or the Authority—
 - (a) must consider all relevant matters, including any matters that indicate the intention of the persons; and

- (b) is not to treat as a determining matter any statement by the persons that describes the nature of their relationship.

22. As made clear by the words “[i]n this Act” in s 6(1)(a), s 6 defines “employee” for the purposes of only the ERA. Consequently the definition does not affect the interpretation of the term “employee” in the ITA or “contract of service” in the GSTA. However, s 6 case law can be relevant when determining employment status for tax purposes. In Bryson v Three Foot Six Ltd the Supreme Court held (at [32] [33]) that the definition of “employee” in s 6(1)(a) – “any person of any age employed by an employer to do any work for hire or reward under a contract of service” – reflected the common law. It also held that the common law tests for determining employment status were relevant when determining the “real nature of the relationship” between the parties under s 6(2) and (3). Therefore, s 6 decisions can be relevant when determining employment status for tax purposes to the extent that those decision concern the common law tests.

Common law on determining employment status – leading New Zealand authorities

23. This part of the guideline discusses the leading New Zealand authorities on determining employment status. These authorities are the Supreme Court decision in Bryson v Three Foot Six Ltd and the Court of Appeal decision in TNT Worldwide Express Ltd v Cunningham.

Bryson v Three Foot Six Ltd

Facts and decision

24. In Bryson v Three Foot Six Ltd the Supreme Court considered whether a person was an “employee” under s 6 of the ERA.
25. In this decision, the appellant, Mr Bryson, was a model maker for Weta Workshop. Weta Workshop had a close working relationship with Three Foot Six Ltd, which was the company that administered the production of The Lord of the Rings. Mr Bryson was seconded from Weta Workshop to Three Foot Six Ltd and soon took a permanent position there. Mr Bryson was not given a written employment contract when he started, but some months later Three Foot Six Ltd supplied a written contract to all staff (the “crew deal memo”). The crew deal memo set out the conditions of employment and, in particular, it referred throughout to “contractor” and “independent contractor”. Mr Bryson was required to sign the crew deal memo every week to secure payment for work done. A year later Mr Bryson was made redundant and he alleged unjustifiable dismissal. He could bring an unjustified dismissal claim only if he were found to have been an employee.
26. At first instance, the Employment Relations Authority held that Mr Bryson was not an “employee” under the ERA. On appeal, Judge Shaw in the Employment Court reversed this decision: Bryson v Three Foot Six Ltd [2003] 1 ERNZ 581. Her Honour held that Mr Bryson was an “employee” despite references to “independent contractor” in the crew deal memo. A majority of the Court of Appeal overturned the Employment Court’s decision: Three Foot Six Ltd v Bryson [2004] 2 ERNZ 526. However, the Supreme Court reversed the Court of Appeal’s decision and upheld that Employment Court’s decision: Bryson v Three Foot Six Ltd [2005] NZSC 34, [2005] 3 NZLR 721.
27. The Supreme Court (at [5]) quoted Judge Shaw from the Employment Court as follows:
- Judge Shaw said that s 6 changed the tests for determining what constituted a contract of service. She summarised the principles she considered to have been established by Employment Court cases on that section [Koia v Carlyon Holdings Ltd [2001] ERNZ 585 and Curlew v Harvey Norman Stores (NZ) Pty Ltd [2002] 1 ERNZ 114 at [19]] as follows:
- The Court must determine the real nature of the relationship.

- The intention of the parties is still relevant but no longer decisive.
 - Statements by the parties, including contractual statements, are not decisive of the nature of the relationship.
 - The real nature of the relationship can be ascertained by analysing the tests that have been historically applied such as control, integration, and the “fundamental” test.
 - The fundamental test examines whether a person performing the services is doing so on their own account.
 - Another matter which may assist in the determination of the issue is industry practice although this is far from determinative of the primary question.
28. The Supreme Court said (at [32]) that Judge Shaw had accurately stated what s 6 requires the courts to do, and had listed the relevant matters to be considered under it. The Supreme Court said that “all relevant matters” certainly include the written and oral terms of the contract between the parties and that the terms will usually contain indications of the parties’ common intention concerning the status of their relationship. The Supreme Court said it was clear from Judge Shaw’s judgment that “she was very much alive to the need to begin by looking at the written terms and conditions which had been agreed to by Mr Bryson and Three Foot Six Ltd”.
29. The Supreme Court made it clear that the common law tests for determining employment status were relevant under s 6 when it stated (at [32]) that “ ‘[a]ll relevant matters’ equally clearly requires the Court or Authority to have regard to features of control and integration and to ... the fundamental test”. It also said (at [33]) that Judge Shaw was correct in saying that the real nature of the relationship could be ascertained by analysing the tests that historically have been applied, such as the control, integration and fundamental tests. The Supreme Court said that Judge Shaw:
- obviously was not suggesting that these three customary indicia were to be applied exclusively. She correctly used them, in conjunction with the other relevant matters to which she referred, in an endeavour to determine the real nature of the relationship, as directed by s 6(2).
30. In the Employment Court, Judge Shaw had concluded that the fact Mr Bryson required six weeks training for the position with Three Foot Six Ltd indicated that he could not be said to have been contracting his skills because he did not have the relevant experience. The company closely controlled the work Mr Bryson did, including requirements about attendance at meetings and specific work hours, which included time when his services were not required. If he had been an independent contractor he would not have been paid for the down time and would have been free to get on with his own private business. Judge Shaw emphasised that her decision was based solely on the individual circumstances of Mr Bryson’s employment and was not to be regarded as affecting the status of any other employee in the film industry.

Industry practice

31. The concept of industry practice was given prominence in Bryson because the outcome was thought to be critical to the New Zealand film industry. In Bryson Three Foot Six Ltd submitted (at [36]) that Mr Bryson was an independent contractor “because that was the invariable practice at Three Foot Six [and] across the film industry.” Judge Shaw in the Employment Court recognised that industry practice was relevant under s 6, but not determinative (at [19]):
- Another matter which may assist in the determination of the issue [of the “real nature of the relationship”] is industry practice although this is far from determinative of the primary question.
32. Judge Shaw held (at [21]) that industry practice was also relevant under the common law. In support of this, her Honour cited Muollo v Rotaru [1995] 2 ERNZ 414, which she held (at [22]) was authority for the proposition that:

... the Court may consider industry practice when assessing the nature of an employment contract especially where a custom or practice is sufficiently well established. In such a case, the Chief Judge held that such practice could go to establishing the intention of the parties.

33. However, on the facts of the case, Judge Shaw held (at [36]) that the industry practice was of little use in establishing the intention of both parties. Later in the judgment (at [57] – [76]), her Honour reviewed the evidence given by expert witnesses as to industry practice and stated (at [68]):

It is clear from the evidence that the defendant and the film and television industry in general has a real and genuine concern that any changes to the present employment arrangements which have been in place for many years will cause significant disruptions in the film industry with potentially adverse outcomes both in economic terms and in terms of attracting overseas film companies to bring the productions to New Zealand. Mr Binnie submitted that a decision in Mr Bryson's favour [ie, that he was an employee] would "automatically 'unwind'" every existing crew deal memo and any future crew contracts for movie productions.

Judge Shaw held that this evidence did not support finding that Mr Bryson was an employee. Her Honour stated that "[w]hilst these concerns are acknowledged ... in the context of this case, they are overstated." Her Honour therefore gave little weight to industry practice on the facts.

34. The majority of the Court of Appeal held that the Employment Court had not given sufficient weight to the evidence of industry practice. It held that industry practice compelled the conclusion that Mr Bryson was not an employee (at [111], [113] and [117]). The Supreme Court disagreed. It held that the Employment Court had not erred in its treatment of industry practice (at [35]):

The question for this Court is whether the Court of Appeal majority was correct in holding that what the Judge said in relation to industry practice amounted to legal error. We do not believe that it was. She did not overlook or ignore the evidence of industry practice. In rejecting a submission from counsel for Mr Bryson, she in fact said that it could not be completely disregarded, referring with evident approval to a case under the Employment Contracts Act where the Chief Judge had held that industry practice could go to establish the intention of the parties. In the case before her, however, the Judge found that industry practice was not helpful in relation to establishing the common intention of Mr Bryson and Three Foot Six for the reasons given by her and mentioned in para [9] above. Later in her judgment she summarised the evidence on industry practice. It was, as she said, given in general terms. She found that it did not apply to Mr Bryson's situation. He had not been working on projects for several producers. He had not operated like a sole trader.

Summary

35. In summary, the following points can be taken from the Supreme Court's decision in Bryson.
36. When determining whether a person is an "employee" as defined in s 6 of the ERA, the common law tests for determining employment status are still relevant. Consequently, s 6 case law is relevant when determining employment status for tax purposes to the extent that it considers and applies the common law tests.
37. Consistent with the common law, s 6 requires the court not to treat as determinative any statement by the parties that describes the nature of their relationship.
38. Also consistent with the common law, s 6 requires the court to consider:
- Matters indicating the intention of the parties, in particular the terms of the contract agreed to (whether in writing or orally) by the parties, and industry practice.
 - Any divergences from, or supplementations of, those terms and conditions that are apparent in the way in which the relationship has operated in practice.
 - Features of control and integration and whether the contracted person has been effectively working on his or her own account (the fundamental test).

[Following the Supreme Court's decision, Parliament amended s 6 of the ERA to insert provisions concerning film workers. Section 6 (1)(d) excludes from the definition of "employee" persons involved in "film production work". The term "film production work" is defined in s 6(7). However, s 6(2) provides that this exclusion "does not apply if the person is a party to, or covered by, a written employment agreement that provides that the person is an employee." As already discussed, s 6 of ERA defines the term "employee" only for the purposes of the ERA.]

TNT Worldwide Express Ltd v Cunningham

39. The other leading New Zealand authority on employment status is the Court of Appeal decision in TNT Worldwide Express Ltd v Cunningham. In this decision, the Court of Appeal discussed in detail the intention, control and fundamental tests developed at common law. The Supreme Court in Bryson cited TNT with approval.
40. In TNT, the appellant company, TNT, engaged the respondent as an owner–driver to conduct a courier service for the company. The owner–driver:
 - provided his own vehicle and was responsible for the vehicle's maintenance and upkeep;
 - was responsible for his own tax and accident compensation payments;
 - claimed deductions as if he were self-employed; and
 - had a contract with TNT that said he was an independent contractor.
41. The company terminated the respondent's contract, and the respondent sought to invoke the personal grievance procedure under the Employment Contracts Act 1991.
42. The Employment Court held that an owner–driver courier for TNT was an employee and not self-employed. In reaching that conclusion, the Court placed considerable emphasis on the rigorous control the company exercised over its owner–drivers. The Employment Court found the company's actions showed that it treated the owner–driver as its employee.
43. On appeal, the Court of Appeal held that the written contract entered into by the parties created a genuine independent contractor relationship. It accepted that an owner–driver courier was an independent contractor rather than an employee where the owner–driver's contract with TNT:
 - required the owner–driver to provide his own vehicle, uniform, approved radio telephone, goods service licence under the Transport Act 1962, and insurance;
 - paid the owner–driver mainly on a per trip basis;
 - made the owner–driver responsible for employing any relief driver;
 - referred to the owner–driver as an independent contractor; and
 - gave TNT very extensive control over the owner–driver's operations.
44. The Court of Appeal acknowledged the extensive control TNT exercised over the owner–driver, but concluded that the owner–driver accepted only that degree of control and supervision necessary for the efficient and profitable conduct of the business he was running on his own account as an independent contractor. Casey J cited (at 697) the following statement of MacKenna J in Ready Mixed Concrete (South East) Ltd v Minister of Pensions and National Insurance [1968] 1 All ER 433, 447:

A man does not cease to run a business on his own account because he agrees to run it efficiently or to accept another's superintendence.

45. The Court of Appeal said that when the contract is wholly in writing and it is not a sham, then the nature of the relationship intended by the parties is determined from the terms of that contract in the light of all the surrounding circumstances at the time the contract was made. Cooke P noted (at 683) that “it is necessary to consider all the terms of the agreement”, and made the following observations (at 686 and 687):

When the terms of a contract are fully set out in writing which is not a sham (and there is no suggestion of a sham in this case) the answer to the question of the nature of the contract must depend on an analysis of the rights and obligations so defined.

In the end, when the contract is wholly in writing, it is the true interpretation and effect of the written terms on which the case must turn.

Common law tests of employment relationship

46. In considering how the distinction between contracts for services and contracts of service is to be made, the Court of Appeal in TNT noted (at 697) the following observation of the Privy Council in Lee Ting Sang v Chung Chi-Keung [1990] 2 AC 374, 382 (PC):

What then is the standard to apply? This has proved to be a most elusive question and despite a plethora of authorities the courts have not been able to devise a single test that will conclusively point to the distinction in all cases.

47. The Privy Council in Lee Ting Sang quoted with approval from the judgment of Cooke J in Market Investigations Ltd v Minister of Social Security [1969] 2 QB 173, 184–185, where it was said that:

No exhaustive list has been compiled and perhaps no exhaustive list can be compiled of considerations which are relevant in determining the question, nor can strict rules be laid down as to the relative weight which the various considerations should carry in particular cases.

48. Although there is no exhaustive list of considerations, the tests discussed below (established by the case law) provide useful guidance as to the factors that are to be considered in determining whether someone is engaged as an employee or contractor. These are relevant tests to be considered, but, as the cases demonstrate, they may not all be relevant to any one particular enquiry.

49. It is important in each case to determine employment status by balancing all the circumstances of the relationship between the parties. Often there will be competing factors that support differing conclusions as to whether someone is an employee or an independent contractor. Applying the tests described below to the facts of a case requires an objective weighing of the various relevant factors to determine the true nature of the relationship.

50. Often the terms of the relationship between two persons will be recorded in a written agreement; though this is not necessarily the case. If there is a written agreement, the first step is to analyse its terms and conditions. However, it is important to note that the nature of the relationship may change over time (eg, a person takes on more duties), and this may not be reflected in the written agreement. Changes in regulations and work practices may also cause the employment status of some workers to change. Or, it could simply be that the written agreement does not accurately reflect how the relationship works in practice. It is necessary to consider how the parties actually work together when determining the type of employment relationship between them. As the Supreme Court in Bryson stated (at [32]):

It is not until the Court or Authority has examined the terms and conditions of the contract and the way in which it actually operated in practice, that it will usually be possible to examine the relationship in light of the control, integration and fundamental tests. Hence the importance, stressed in TNT, of analysing the contractual rights and obligations.

51. In Bryson and TNT the main common law tests for determining employment status – the intention, control, fundamental and integration tests – were discussed. In the following paragraphs, these tests (along with the independence test) are examined in greater detail.

52. It is important to keep in mind that the application of the common law tests is a weighing up process. Sometimes the facts of a particular case may suggest different characterisations of the relationship, and there may be either overlap or tensions between the tests.
53. Also, as the characterisation of the relationship is dependent on the particular facts at hand, it is crucial that the facts are well understood, including any changes to the relationship that have occurred over time.

Intention of the parties test

54. The intention of the parties test looks at the intentions of each party to the agreement regarding the nature of the relationship. The description given to a relationship by the parties to the contract is a strong, but not conclusive indication of the type of relationship that exists. The fact a written contract states that a person is an employee or an independent contractor may indicate the intention of the parties, but it is not determinative: Bryson, at [32] (SCNZ). Holland J in the High Court in Challenge Realty Ltd v CIR [1990] 12 NZTC 7,012, at 7,032 said:

Obviously the Court's function in interpreting a contract is to determine the intentions of the parties. When, however, the question for determination is the legal relationship between the parties created by the contract, the expressed intention of the parties will not be determinative of the question. It is nevertheless an important factor, and if after considering all factors the exact state of the relationship is a matter of some ambiguity, may be decisive. In the present cases before me Harcourts is the only one with a written agreement. Nevertheless I would conclude that in all cases it was the intention of the parties to create an agency relationship rather than an employer/employee relationship. The question remains as to whether that result has been achieved.
55. If the actual circumstances point to an employment relationship, then simply labelling it an independent contract relationship will not alter the true position.
56. In TNT, a clause in the written contract that purported to override all other aspects of the agreement stated that the courier was an independent contractor. The Employment Court found that the actual conduct of the relationship showed that TNT imposed a high level of control and supervision of its staff that was inconsistent with any independence or initiative on the part of its staff. However, the Court of Appeal in reversing this decision concluded, after weighing all the circumstances, that the TNT standard form contract created a genuine independent contractor relationship.
57. The taxation arrangements between the parties may be relevant when establishing their intentions. In Bryson the Employment Court stated (at [55]) that "tax status can be an indicator of what a person intends his contractual relationship to be". For example, if the person engaged to perform the services is paid at a set-rate at regular intervals and PAYE is deducted, this may support the view that the parties intended a contract of service. However, in some cases, taxation arrangements between the parties may not be given much weight. In Bryson, Mr Bryson completed IR3 forms, which referred to the taxpayer as being self-employed in business or trade, and had claimed deductions for work related expenses. The Employment Court stated (at [55]) that this was not conclusive evidence that Mr Bryson was an independent contractor, because he had not registered for GST, and payslips received from Three Foot Six Ltd referred to PAYE deductions having been made. In these circumstances, it could not be said that Mr Bryson had acquiesced to independent contractor status.
58. In some circumstances industry practice may be relevant when determining the intention of the parties. As already discussed, in Bryson the Supreme Court agreed with the Employment Court's statement that industry practice could be relevant when considering the parties' intention, but that it was not determinative.

59. In Bryson Three Foot Six Ltd submitted that Mr Bryson should be regarded as an independent contractor, because the invariable industry practice was that production workers were hired as independent contractors. Expert witnesses explained that the reason for this practice was the project-based, intermittent nature of screen productions and that production workers normally worked with several different producers during the course of the year. The Employment Court held that the evidence of industry practice was of little use on the facts of this case, because it was "necessarily general" and not consistent with the particular circumstances of Mr Bryson's case. Mr Bryson worked continuously for Three Foot Six Ltd alone and, unlike other workers in the industry, did not own any plant or equipment and did not operate as a sole trader (at [59] – [60]). Mr Bryson's working conditions were therefore not typical of the industry.
60. By contrast, in Muollo v Rotaru industry practice was given considerable weight. In Bryson the Employment Court cited Muollo as authority for the proposition that industry practice was relevant at common law when considering the parties' intention as to their employment relationship. In Muollo the Employment Court considered whether Mr Rotaru, who worked as a crew member aboard a fishing vessel, was an employee for the purposes of the Employment Contracts Act 1991 (repealed). There was no written employment agreement. The Employment Court concluded that Mr Rotaru was an independent contractor, and considered this conclusion was supported by the "custom and usage in the commercial fishing industry". It stated that the evidence of industry practice (at 425 – 426, footnotes omitted):

... presents a picture of an industry in which the co-operative venture is not only prevalent and a typical mode of conducting business but a commercial norm. All parties under such arrangements share in the proceeds. The commercial reasons for it suggested by Mr Gartrell were five in number, as follows:

- "1. It conduces to business viability;
- "2. ensures proper work attitudes;
- "3. takes cognisance of the fact that work is intermittent, and its duration uncertain;
- "4. acknowledges the seasonal nature of the work; and
- "5. means that there is not a pool of people waiting round in off-times with no work but still having to be paid."

Mr Gartrell urged upon me the good sense of the industry's considerations moving it to adopt this custom, mentioning the sporadic nature of the enterprise and the use of a percentage basis of determining the rewards and sharing productivity and risk. Along much the same lines Mr Gartrell stressed a total of six factors that were particularly important to both appellants:

- "1. work was intermittent;
- "2. duration of work was uncertain;
- "3. no liability for sick and holiday pay;
- "4. the business did not want the liability of an employee when work was not available;
- "5. proper work attitudes;
- "6. business/work cohesion."

61. An expert witness also stated (at 426) that he was not aware of any fishing vessels where a crew member was on a wage or salary. In the expert's opinion, the normal arrangement was for crew members to be paid according to their share of the catch; for withholding tax to be deducted at source; and for crew members to pay their own ACC levies. The Employment Court stated (at 426) that this evidence was consistent with the circumstances in which Mr Rotaru provided his services. It concluded (at 428) that the evidence of industry practice showed that the parties' intention was to enter into a contract for services.

62. In summary, industry practice may be relevant when establishing the parties' intention, especially where the custom or practice is sufficiently well established. Industry practice is not determinative, and it may be given less weight where it is inconsistent with the facts of the particular relationship considered.

Control test

63. The control test looks at the degree of control the employer or principal exerts over the work an employee or contractor is to do and the manner in which it is to be done. The greater the extent to which the principal or employer specifies work content, hours and methods and can supervise and regulate a person, the more likely it is the person is an employee.
64. The control test used to be considered the deciding test, but this is no longer the case. The Court of Appeal in TNT emphasised that control is only one of several factors relevant to the interpretation of the contract. The Court endorsed the statement of Cooke J in Market Investigations Ltd (at 185) that while control will always have to be considered, it can no longer be regarded as the sole factor in determining the relationship between the parties. The Court of Appeal in TNT considered the Employment Court had given this factor too much weight.

Independence test

65. The independence test was not mentioned in Bryson or TNT, but has been discussed in several Taxation Review Authority cases that determined employment status: Case U9 (1999) 19 NZTC 9,077; Case X17 (2006) 22 NZTC 12,224; and Case Z10 (2009) 24 NZTC 14,113. The independence test is simply the inverse of the control test. A high level of independence on the part of an employee or a contractor is inconsistent with a high level of control by an employer or a principal.
66. A person generally has a high level of independence if they:
- work for multiple people or clients (but the fact the person works for only one person or client does not necessarily mean the person is an employee);
 - work from their own premises;
 - supply their own (specialised) tools or equipment;
 - have direct responsibility for the profits and risks of the business;
 - hire or fire whomever they wish to help them do the job;
 - advertise and invoice for the work;
 - supply the equipment, premises and materials used;
 - pay or account for taxes and government and professional levies.
67. On the other hand, when some independent contractors perform work for a principal, they may agree not to work for a competitor or give away trade secrets. This alone will not make the worker an employee (it actually emphasises that the worker is usually entitled to work for others).

Fundamental test

68. In the Employment Court decision in Bryson, Judge Shaw applied Market Investigations Ltd v Minister of Social Security [1969] 2 QB 173, in which Cooke J said that the fundamental test for distinguishing an employee and an independent contractor was as follows (at 184–185):

Is the person who has engaged himself to perform these services performing them as a person in business on his own account? If the answer to that question is 'yes', then the contract is a contract for services. If the answer is 'no', then the contract is a contract of service. ... factors which may be of importance are such matters as whether the man performing the services provides his own equipment, whether he hires his own helpers, what degree of financial risk he takes, what degree of responsibility for investment and management he has, and whether and how far he has an opportunity of profiting from sound management in the performance of his task.

69. The Privy Council approved the fundamental test in Lee Ting Sang. This Privy Council decision was subsequently cited by four of the five judges in the Court of Appeal in TNT.

70. The fundamental test is also sometimes described as the "business test" or the "economic reality test". In Challenge, the Court of Appeal stated (at 65):

If it is helpful to look for a test or application in this case, apart from that of control, which is a key feature of the Act, we favour that suggested by Adrian Merritt, Lecturer in Industrial Law, University of New South Wales in his article 'Control' v 'Economic Reality': Defining the Contract of Employment' in (1982) 10 Australian Business Law Review 105 at p 118:

The issue that must be settled in today's cases is whether the worker is genuinely in business on his own account or whether he is "part and parcel of" - or "integrated into" - the enterprise of the person or organisation for whom work is performed. The test is, therefore, one of "economic reality".

71. The fundamental test looks at factors such as:

- whether the type of business or the nature of the job justifies or requires using an independent contractor;
- the behaviour of the parties before and after entering into the contract;
- whether there is a time limit for completing a specific project;
- whether the worker can be dismissed;
- who is responsible for correcting sub-standard work;
- who is legally liable if the job goes wrong.

72. Usually, an independent contractor agrees to be responsible for their work. An independent contractor cannot usually be "dismissed", although the contract can be terminated if it is broken.

Integration test

73. In Enterprise Cars Ltd v CIR (1988) 10 NZTC 5,126, Sinclair J said that the integration test is really whether the person is part and parcel of the organisation and not whether the work is necessary for the running of the business.

74. According to the integration test, a job is likely to be done by an employee if it is:

- integral to the business organisation;
- the type of work commonly done by "employees";
- continuous (not a "one-off" or accessory operation);
- for the benefit of the business rather than for the benefit of the worker.

75. In Bryson Judge Shaw in the Employment Court quoted Lord Denning's "classic description of this test" from his judgment in Stevenson Jordan & Harrison Ltd v MacDonalds [1952] TLR 101, 111 (CA):

Under a contract of service, a man is employed as part of the business, and his work is done as an integral part of the business; whereas, under a contract for services, his work, although done for the business, is not integrated into it but is only accessory to it.

Recent cases

Three case summaries

76. This part of the guideline discusses three cases heard in the Employment Court since the Supreme Court's decision in Bryson:

- Tse v Cieffe (NZ) Ltd [2009] ERNZ 20;

- Kiwikiwi v Maori Television Service (2007) 5 NZLR 6;
- Tsoupakis v Fendalton Construction Ltd (EMC Wellington WC 16/09, 18 June 2009).

These decisions concern employment status under s 6 of the ERA. As already discussed, s 6 decisions can be relevant when determining employment status for tax purposes to the extent that the decisions concern the common law tests.

77. The intention of this discussion is to provide an understanding of how the courts approach the question of employment status following Bryson. When considering such decisions, it is important to keep in mind that each case turns on its own facts. As Judge Shaw noted in Tse v Cieffe (NZ) Ltd "previous case law is only useful in reiterating the relevant principles" (at [6]).

Tse v Cieffe (NZ) Ltd

Facts

78. In Tse v Cieffe (NZ) Ltd the issue was the plaintiff's employment status. Ms Tse worked for Cieffe (NZ) Ltd from 2005 to 2008.
79. At the beginning of the relationship between the parties there was no written contract between the parties. An oral agreement was reached about the terms of the relationship between the parties. The terms included that Ms Tse would:
- work for 20 hours a week and would be paid at an agreed hourly rate;
 - work on the company's internal system but also have some reception duties and general office administration duties;
 - invoice Cieffe as a contractor rather than be paid as an employee.
80. In 2007, Cieffe provided Ms Tse with a written consultancy agreement. The agreement provided that Ms Tse's work would be performed under the general supervision and direction of a Cieffe representative, but that Ms Tse was not an employee of Cieffe. Ms Tse signed the agreement.
81. Ms Tse performed the duties that were agreed between the parties at the outset of the relationship, as well as sharing a variety of other office tasks such as tidying and cleaning with other employees. When the work Ms Tse had originally been engaged for was nearing completion she was asked to provide further ongoing services that were related to the original work. Ms Tse's work was closely supervised.
82. By her own choice, Ms Tse worked regular hours. She was not instructed to attend the office at any specific time. Over time her hours increased to 40 hours a week with some overtime. When Ms Tse would not be at work she would advise Cieffe that she would not be present; she would not request leave.
83. Ms Tse invoiced Cieffe for the hours that she worked. Initially, Ms Tse invoiced Cieffe through a company that Ms Tse had set up with her partner. After several months Ms Tse began invoicing Cieffe in her own name. For the first year of the relationship Ms Tse added GST to the invoices but she stopped doing this when she discovered that she was not required to be registered for GST.
84. Cieffe provided Ms Tse with branded clothing at work, a credit card (which was used on a business trip), and a business card. The business card had Cieffe's logo and described Ms Tse as "Office Manager" and later as "Client Relationship Assistant Manager".
85. At several times throughout the period that Ms Tse worked for Cieffe she referred to herself as a contractor.

Application of law

86. Intention of the parties: Judge Shaw found that “at the commencement of the relationship both parties deliberately entered into an independent contracting arrangement”. The arrangement was evidenced by the method of invoicing and Ms Tse’s references to herself as a contractor. Judge Shaw found that the consultancy agreement “confirms the nature of the relationship which had existed from the outset”.
87. Control: Ms Tse’s counsel argued that several factors pointed towards Ms Tse being under the control of Cieffe. One factor was that some of the tasks Ms Tse performed were not sufficiently specialised. Another factor was that Ms Tse’s work was supervised by a Cieffe representative. Judge Shaw noted that the non-specific tasks (such as tidying and cleaning) would not generally be performed by a contractor. However, other factors pointed towards a lower level of control by Cieffe than would be expected in an employment relationship. In particular, it was up to Ms Tse when she would undertake the work and she worked a variety of hours each month.
88. Integration: The integration test indicated that Ms Tse was an employee of Cieffe. Judge Shaw stated (at [47]):
- In some aspects the evidence points to a degree of integration of Ms Tse into the business. These are the business cards and the Cieffe branded clothing. She used Cieffe equipment and had access to the building. Calling her an office manager or client relationship assistant manager certainly presents an image of her to the outside observer as somebody who was part of the management team rather than running a separate business on their own. Such integration would not normally be expected of a consultant.
89. Fundamental test: Judge Shaw found that Ms Tse’s supply of invoices to Cieffe evidenced a business relationship. Ms Tse’s references to herself as a contractor also supported the view that she was in business on her own account.

Conclusion

90. Judge Shaw concluded (at [50]):
- While there were some elements in the conduct of [Tse’s] employment which, viewed in isolation, would not support a finding that she was self-employed, taken in the round I find that the real nature of the relationship between Ms Tse and Cieffe was, as intended, a contract for services.

Kiwikiwi v Maori Television Service

Facts

91. In Kiwikiwi v Maori Television Service the issue was whether Mr Kiwikiwi was an employee or an independent contractor of Maori Television Service (MTS). Mr Kiwikiwi worked as a teleprompter for MTS.
92. When Mr Kiwikiwi started working for MTS he was filling an urgent vacancy and had no experience as a teleprompter. There was no written agreement at the beginning of the relationship between the parties. Mr Kiwikiwi understood that he was on a one-month trial period with the prospect of a full-time job at the end of the trial period if he was suitable. He was told he would have at least 30 hours work a week with more at times. (As the volume of work for teleprompters fluctuates seasonally, hours were flexible.)
93. It was agreed between the parties that Mr Kiwikiwi would be operating on a roster that was prepared a month in advance. He would be paid an hourly rate and would present invoices to be paid.
94. Mr Kiwikiwi undertook teleprompting work but also did various ancillary duties such as photocopying and banking. After he expressed concern at the additional tasks he was asked to perform he was given a role profile description. Mr Kiwikiwi worked between 30 and 40 hours a week.

95. After seven and a half months of work, Mr Kiwikiwi was concerned that he still did not have an employment contract. He contacted MTS's operation manager requesting an employment contract. Following this his rostered hours were reduced. The operation manager began to have issues with Mr Kiwikiwi's performance and it was decided that Mr Kiwikiwi had to do some re-training before he could be re-rostered.
96. MTS argued that it was typical working practice in the television industry for teleprompters to be freelancers. Only one teleprompter had been an employee of MTS, with all other teleprompters being freelancers. However, the Court heard evidence that TVNZ uses a combination of employees and freelancers as teleprompters.

Application of law

97. Intention of the parties: Judge Shaw found that there was no evidence of any common intention by the parties. The parties discussed some "incidents of employment" such as the hourly rate and rostered hours but did not discuss Kiwikiwi's employment status.
98. Control: MTS argued that as Mr Kiwikiwi was free to do his work as he saw fit and was not subject to the control of MTS. Judge Shaw found that Mr Kiwikiwi was controlled by MTS's systems. Mr Kiwikiwi was required to comply with the set rosters, had no flexibility within the role and had to perform additional tasks to teleprompting. The role profile description he was given was prescriptive. When standards slipped Mr Kiwikiwi had to undergo re-training.
99. Fundamental test: Judge Shaw found that Mr Kiwikiwi was not in business on his own account as an independent contractor. The factors that lead to this conclusion included:
- Mr Kiwikiwi was not registered for GST;
 - Mr Kiwikiwi did not work for any other employer apart from some shearing work over summer when little work was available from MTS;
 - Mr Kiwikiwi had no separate accounts and did not operate under a business entity (such as a company);
 - Mr Kiwikiwi did not bring any experience or skill to the position;
 - Mr Kiwikiwi took no financial risk with his own capital and could not alter his profits by changing his work habits.
100. Judge Shaw stated that the invoices that Mr Kiwikiwi rendered each fortnight were inconclusive as he only rendered them in order to get paid.
101. Integration: Judge Shaw found that Mr Kiwikiwi's position was an integral part of the production process; it was "not an adjunct which the television station could do without" (at [42]).
102. Industry practice: Judge Shaw stated that industry practice can be relevant to both the intention of the parties and to the nature of the continuing relationship. However, the industry practice was not black and white, with MTS having employed a teleprompter as an employee in the past, and with TVNZ using a combination of employees and independent contractors. Therefore, industry practice did not assist in determining Mr Kiwikiwi's employment status.

Conclusion

103. Judge Shaw concluded that the real nature of the relationship between Mr Kiwikiwi and MTS was one of employer/employee.

Facts

104. The issue in Tsoupakis v Fendalton Construction Ltd was whether Mr Tsoupakis was an employee or an independent contractor. Mr Tsoupakis worked as a painter for Fendalton Construction for six months in 2005 and 2006 and then again for a year from 2007 to 2008. It was agreed by the parties that Mr Tsoupakis was an independent contractor during the 2005/2006 period. The issue before the Employment Court was whether Mr Tsoupakis was an employee or an independent contractor for the 2007/2008 period.
105. Fendalton Construction hired both employees and independent contractors to undertake painting work. Contractors were generally paid a higher hourly rate. Fendalton Construction provided both types of staff with mobile phones to keep in touch during jobs.
106. Mr Tsoupakis was not given an employment agreement, despite repeatedly asking for a copy of his contract.
107. Mr Tsoupakis filled out a daily work record, including the hours worked and the address of the jobs worked on. He could reclaim costs of travel to jobs in some circumstances. Mr Tsoupakis submitted weekly invoices to Fendalton Construction for payment.
108. Mr Tsoupakis had his own business card that described him as a director of his own trading entity. There was no evidence that he used the card to solicit business for himself while working for Fendalton Construction. Mr Tsoupakis also had sign writing on his motor vehicle advertising his trading name and personal mobile number. Neither the car sign-writing nor the business card referred to Mr Tsoupakis's association with Fendalton Construction.
109. While on jobs, Mr Tsoupakis was not supervised constantly by Fendalton Construction but on most jobs Mr Tsoupakis's work was inspected by Fendalton Construction.
110. Fendalton Construction provided some of the tools required to do the jobs (although usually not paint brushes) and all of the consumables required (such as paint and rags). Mr Tsoupakis purchased materials as required for jobs using Fendalton Construction's trade accounts.
111. Mr Tsoupakis was given work on a daily basis with detailed work directions. He could be redirected to jobs when Fendalton Construction required. Mr Tsoupakis was expected to meet set criteria such as the time to be taken and the volume of paint to be used. He was required to check in with Fendalton Construction when he finished a job. Mr Tsoupakis could not delegate his work to others to complete, and he was expected not to undertake other work.

Application of law

112. Intention of the parties: Chief Judge Colgan found that there was no discernable mutual intention of the parties as there had been no express discussion about the nature of their relationship.
113. Control: Chief Judge Colgan found that Fendalton Construction exercised a high degree of control over Mr Tsoupakis's work – both what was done and also how and when it was to be done. Mr Tsoupakis had to account in detail for his hours of work and had no ability to delegate or organise as he chose. In reality he was constrained from working for anyone else or for himself.
114. Integration: The facts pointed towards Mr Tsoupakis having some elements of independence from Fendalton Construction – in particular his business cards, the sign-writing on his vehicle, and that he was invited to the contractors' Christmas party (as opposed to the employees' party). Chief Judge Colgan found that despite these elements Tsoupakis was an integral part of Fendalton's business in the same way as would be expected of an employee. Factors pointing towards Mr Tsoupakis's integration were that he was held out as a member of Fendalton Construction's staff and that he was paid for the time that he worked rather than a set fee for each job.

115. Fundamental test: Chief Judge Colgan found that Mr Tsoupakis was not in business on his own account. Mr Tsoupakis provided his own paint brushes but other equipment was provided by Fendalton Construction. The fact Mr Tsoupakis was not trained by Fendalton Construction was a neutral factor as Mr Tsoupakis was engaged as an experienced tradesperson.
116. Industry practice: Only limited evidence was presented to the Court on industry practice in the painting industry. Chief Judge Colgan found that the evidence of industry practice was neutral as it established that companies (including Fendalton Construction) engaged both independent contractors and employees as painters.

Conclusion

117. Chief Judge Colgan concluded that Mr Tsoupakis was an employee of Fendalton Construction for the 2007/2008 period.

Appendix – Legislation

Goods and Services Tax Act 1985

1. Section 6 reads:

6 Meaning of term taxable activity

- (1) For the purposes of this Act, the term taxable activity means—
- (a) any activity which is carried on continuously or regularly by any person, whether or not for a pecuniary profit, and involves or is intended to involve, in whole or in part, the supply of goods and services to any other person for a consideration; and includes any such activity carried on in the form of a business, trade, manufacture, profession, vocation, association, or club:
 - (b) without limiting the generality of paragraph (a), the activities of any public authority or any local authority.
- (2) Anything done in connection with the beginning or ending, including a premature ending, of a taxable activity is treated as being carried out in the course or furtherance of the taxable activity.
- (3) Notwithstanding anything in subsections (1) and (2), for the purposes of this Act the term taxable activity shall not include, in relation to any person,—
- (a) being a natural person, any activity carried on essentially as a private recreational pursuit or hobby; or
 - (aa) not being a natural person, any activity which, if it were carried on by a natural person, would be carried on essentially as a private recreational pursuit or hobby; or
 - (b) any engagement, occupation, or employment under any contract of service or as a director of a company:
provided that where any person, in carrying on any taxable activity, accepts any office, any services supplied by that person as the holder of that office shall be deemed to be supplied in the course or furtherance of that taxable activity; or
 - (c) any engagement, occupation, or employment—
 - (i) pursuant to the Civil List Act 1979 or the Governor-General Act 2010:
 - (ii) as a Judge, Solicitor-General, Controller and Auditor-General, or Ombudsman:
 - (ia) pursuant to an appointment made by the Governor-General or the Governor-General in Council and evidenced by a warrant or by an Order in Council or by a notice published in the Gazette in accordance with section 2(2) of the Official Appointments and Documents Act 1919:
 - (iii) as a Chairman or member of any local authority or any statutory board, council, committee, or other body; or
 - (d) any activity to the extent to which the activity involves the making of exempt supplies.

Income Tax Act 2007

2. The definition of the term “employee” in s YA 1(1) reads:

employee—

- (a) means a person who receives or is entitled to receive a PAYE income payment:
- (b) in sections CW 17, CW 17B, CW 17C, and CW 18 (which relate to expenditure, reimbursement, and allowances of employees) includes a person to whom section RD 3(2) to (4) (PAYE income payments) applies:
- (c) in the FBT rules, and in the definition of shareholder-employee (paragraph (b)), does not include a person if the only PAYE income payment received or receivable is—
 - (i) a payment referred to in section RD 5(1)(b)(iii), (3), (6)(b) and (c) and (7) (Salary or wages):
 - (ii) a schedular payment referred to in schedule 4, parts A and I (Rates of tax for schedular payments) for which the person is liable for income tax under section BB 1 (Imposition of income tax):

- (d) is defined in section DC 15 (Some definitions) for the purposes of sections DC 12 to DC 14 (which relate to share purchase schemes):
- (db) does not include an owner of a look-through company or a person who has a look-through interest for a look-through company, unless the owner or person is a working owner:
- (e) for an employer, means an employee of the employer

3. The definition of the term “employee” in s DC 15 reads:

DC 15 Some definitions

Definitions

- (1) In this section, and in sections DC 12 to DC 14,—
employee—
 - (a) means a person employed by a company:
 - (b) does not include—
 - (i) a director of the company; or
 - (ii) a person who, with any associated person, holds 10% or more of the issued capital of the company; or
 - (iii) a company, a local authority, a public authority, or an unincorporated body of persons

4. Section RD 3 reads:

RD 3 PAYE income payments

Meaning generally

- (1) The PAYE rules apply to a PAYE income payment which—
 - (a) means—
 - (i) a payment of salary or wages, see section RD 5; or
 - (ii) extra pay, see section RD 7; or
 - (iii) a schedular payment, see section RD 8:
 - (b) does not include—
 - (i) an amount attributed under section GB 29 (Attribution rule: calculation):
 - (ii) an amount paid to a shareholder-employee in the circumstances set out in subsection (2):
 - (iii) an amount paid or benefit provided, by a person (the claimant) who receives a personal service rehabilitation payment from which an amount of tax has been withheld at the rate specified in schedule 4, part I (Rates of tax for schedular payments) or under section RD 18 (Schedular payments without notification), to another person for providing a key aspect of social rehabilitation referred to in paragraph (c) of the definition of personal service rehabilitation payment in section YA 1 (Definitions).

When subsections (3) and (4) apply: close companies

- (2) Subsections (3) and (4) apply for an income year when a person is a shareholder-employee of a close company, and—
 - (a) they do not derive as an employee salary or wages of a regular amount for regular pay periods—
 - (i) of 1 month or less throughout the income year; or
 - (ii) that total 66% or more of the annual gross income of the person in the corresponding tax year as an employee; or
 - (b) an amount is paid as income that may later be allocated to them as an employee for the income year.

Income in current tax year

- (3) The person may choose to treat all amounts paid to them in the income year in their capacity as employee of the close company as income other than from a PAYE income payment.

Income in later tax years

- (4) All amounts paid to the person in later income years in their capacity as employee of the close company are treated as income other than from a PAYE income payment.

If questions arise

- (5) If a question arises whether the PAYE rules apply to all or part of a PAYE income payment, other than an amount referred to in subsections (2) to (4), the Commissioner must determine the matter.

5. Section RD 5 reads:

 - (iv) is made in 1 lump sum or in 2 or more instalments; and
 - (b) includes a payment of the kind described in paragraph (a) made—
 - (i) as a bonus, gratuity, or share of profits; or
 - (ii) as a redundancy payment; or
 - (iii) when the person retires from employment; or
 - (iv) as a result of a retrospective increase in salary or wages, but only to the extent described in subsection (2); and
 - (c) includes an amount of income that a person derives under section CE 9 (Restrictive covenants) or CE 10 (Exit inducements) if the income is derived in connection with an employment relationship between the person and the person who paid the amount; and
 - (d) does not include a payment of exempt income.

Limit on retrospective increase in salary or wages

- (2) A payment described in subsection (1)(b)(iv) is included in extra pay only to the extent to which,—
 - (a) it accrues from the start of the increase until the start of the first pay period in which the increase is included in salary or wages; and
 - (b) when a week ends with a Saturday, the total of the increase for the week, and of the salary or wages for the week excluding the increase, and of any other salary or wages that the person earns for the week, is more than $4.

7. Section RD 8 reads:

RD 8 Scholar payments

Meaning

- (1) A schedular payment—
 - (a) means—

- (i) a payment of a class set out in schedule 4 (Rates of tax for schedular payments); and
